What makes the International Geological Congress unique?

The conference represents the 'Olympics' of geology and is held every four years in a city selected for its attraction as a meeting destination and also in recognition of the host country's outstanding geology and long term contributions to the earth sciences. South Africa will be hosting the 35TH IGC in Cape Town in 2016. The event will be a Pan African one with the support of the major African Geoscientific Societies and other related organisations. Large numbers of African delegates are expected to attend and field trips are planned to all parts of the African continent.

The IGC, which was founded in 1876, is the pre-eminent global geoscience congress – it provides a forum for presenting scientific results across the whole spectrum of the geosciences, facilitates the holding of business meetings, encourages international networking and provides the opportunity to study geological features of interest through field trips. Each IGC has had its own flavour and features, reflecting the circumstances in the host region and what it sees as important for such a large and prestigious event.

The 35TH IGC will have a wide-ranging technical program, united by the theme 'Geology in Science, the Economy and Society', with a view to delivering solutions to the world's challenges. The event will include approximately 35 parallel sessions over five days as well as workshops and short courses relevant to:

- environment, heritage and education ('Geology in Society');
- minerals, water, oil and gas ('Geology in the Economy');
- latest developments in earth sciences ('Geology in Science').

34TH IGC, Brisbane - Statistics

- 6012 Delegates from 123 Countries
- 3712 Oral presentations
- 1469 Poster presentations

The event offers opportunities for companies in the area of staff recruitment, as well as the forging of contacts with developing countries, notably those in Africa. It will also offer the opportunity for brand-building, with the technical community and with governments. There is also the opportunity for individuals and companies to assist with skills development, enhancing their corporate citizenship in a rapidly growing and evolving African economy.

Who attends the International Geological Congress?

Based on the attendance at recent IGC's (Brisbane, Oslo and Florence), IGC 2016 is expected to attract between 6 000 and 10 000 delegates from at least 100 countries including attendees from African countries. As a result, this will be the largest gathering of geoscientists ever held in Africa.
